

Employing a personal assistant to support you at work

A guide for people with physical or sensory impairments

Contents

What do workplace PAs do? 3

Working with a workplace PA 4

Useful conversations to have with your line manager 6

Useful conversations to have with your workplace PA 8

Inserts

- Tips for line managers
- Tips for workplace PAs

Employing workplace PAs

Employing a personal assistant (PA) to support you at work can be different to employing a home-based PA. At work, you are a professional, and your PA's behaviour can reflect on you. Your colleagues may ask your PA to do things for them too. Your PA may not know how to act in your workplace environment.

What do workplace PAs do?

Workplace PAs support their disabled employers to do their jobs by providing assistance with personal care and/or workplace tasks, for example taking notes in meetings, driving, or setting up rooms for events.

Some PAs work only in the workplace, while others also support the disabled person at home too, so need to adapt to these different settings.

While the specifics of a PA's work are unique to each disabled person in their particular workplace, the role is to enable the disabled person to do their job. In doing so, the PA seeks to ensure that they remain in the background themselves.

This document is based on research which explored the role of the workplace PA for people with physical or sensory impairments for the first time. The research involved in-depth conversations with workplace PAs, disabled workers and their line managers, and all three groups fed into the development of this document.

"I've been in situations where I really feel like I did want to contribute something and I've had to bite my tongue. If somebody's noticing you you're probably not doing your job right."

[MATT, WORKPLACE PA]

Working with a workplace PA

Be clear about the support you want from your workplace PA at work

- Clarify with your workplace personal assistant what you expect from them.
- Offer guidance and respond to problems or concerns as they arise.
- Don't make assumptions about what your workplace PA does or doesn't know, encourage them to ask you for guidance.

Supporting your workplace PA to feel part of the organisation

- Be open and honest with your line manager about the assistance you require.
- Pass on to your workplace PA any workplace developments affecting them and their work, for example changes to car parking arrangements.
- Speak to your line manager if your workplace PA does not have what they need to do their job, or if colleagues repeatedly use your PA as a general resource.

The role of a workplace PA is complex and needs managing

- Get to know your personal assistant from the start and implement a probationary period.
 - Think about your own management skills – would you benefit from further training, for example in supervision and maintaining boundaries between a professional relationship and a friendship?
 - If you have more than one workplace PA, considering organising tasks to maximise their different skills and strengths.
-

"It's not enough to say 'my door's always open'. What I find works quite well is to talk when my PAs are driving me to and from places".

[NICOLA, DISABLED WORKER]

- If you have workplace and home support from the same PA, clarify any different expectations in these settings, for example dress code or the PA joining in conversations.

Supervision is important, so make time for regular formal reviews

- Informal discussion is also useful – capitalise on opportunities (eg travel time) to discuss how things are going and identify problems early.

Create clear boundaries – this is not always easy and may evolve over time

- Working one-to-one with your workplace PA can be intense, but it is important to keep professional boundaries.

Support your workplace personal assistant

- Workplace PAs value knowing what is going to happen, especially if your job involves different locations and travel. Share your work plan so that they can prepare, for example, for a particular dress code or a late finish.
- Workplace PAs are usually not part of the formal staff structure of the organisation. In turn your colleagues may be uncertain how to relate to your PA, especially if they have little prior experience. This can mean lead to your PA feeling isolated and out of place, making it harder for them to do their job well.

Useful conversations with your line manager

When you are starting a new job, or employing a new workplace PA, it is useful to have conversations with your line manager and your workplace PA before you start work.

Before you start work

- Meet formally before you start work to clarify both your role (to manage your workplace PA) and the role of your line manager (to manage you).
- Discuss your workplace support needs.
- Ensure any reasonable adjustments are in place. If you are applying to the Department of Work and Pensions Access to Work scheme, put in your application as soon as possible.
- Find out if any further support can be offered from the organisation, for example training if you are managing a workplace PA for the first time.

Expectations

- Clarify norms and expectations of the organisation, for example in relation to dress code and language use. Will your workplace PA be required to meet these expectations too?

“While I don’t perceive myself as vulnerable, my employer requires anyone working in the building to have a Disclosure and Barring Service check, which includes my PAs”

RHYS, DISABLED WORKER

e manager

Can an induction be arranged for your workplace PA

Induction

- Can an induction be arranged for your workplace PA, at least covering fire evacuation procedure and 'who does what' in the organisation?
- Consider security - does access to the building or computer system need to be arranged for the PA?

Confidentiality and other relevant organisational policies

- Do you have to sign a confidentiality agreement as part of your job? How will you ensure that your workplace PA also adheres to this policy? For example, have you asked them to sign a confidentiality agreement with you?

Specific training

- Is any training required for a PA to understand and work in the specific environment, for example bespoke health and safety issues or computer systems?

Discuss how to manage colleagues' expectations

- Ensure colleagues understand the unique role of the workplace PA and that they are not a general resource for the organisation.
- Clarify the appropriate level of formal interaction between the workplace PA and colleagues.
- Agree how these ground rules will be shared with close colleagues.

Discuss how to manage colleagues' expectations

Conversations with your workplace

Discuss the job description in depth

- What are the main tasks for you and for your workplace PA? What skills will your workplace PA require?

Working hours

- Does your job involve flexible working? If so, what degree of flexibility do you require from your PA?
- Are you likely to require your workplace PA to work overtime? How will this be arranged, and how much notice will be given?
- How is payment agreed and made?

Annual leave and sick leave

- How are holiday dates agreed? What happens when you take annual leave yourself?
- What happens if you or your workplace PA is sick?

Responsibilities

- Explain your responsibilities towards your workplace PA, and discuss their responsibilities and those of your line manager.

Interaction with colleagues in the workplace

- Think about how to introduce your personal assistant to colleagues so they are aware of their role.

What happens if you or your workplace PA is sick?

e PA

- Discuss the level of appropriate interaction your workplace PA should have with others in the workplace. For example when should the PA be involved in discussions and when should they stay quiet? You might think this is obvious, but it can be difficult for a PA to judge, so they may need guidance from you.

Think about how to manage the times when the PA is not directly needed

- Are you happy for your PA to stay in the room and read a book or look at a phone if not needed?

Think about how to manage the times when the PA is not directly needed

"The induction period is really rich in conversation. I build in an understanding of what they think their job is, what I expect from them, and a shared understanding of values and beliefs"

JOEL, DISABLED WORKER

This document is based on findings of a research project which explored the role of the workplace PA for people with physical or sensory impairments for the first time. The research involved in-depth conversations with workplace PAs, disabled workers and their line managers, and all three groups also fed into the development of this document.

The role of a workplace PA is of course specific to the needs of the person being supported, their job and the organisation in which they work. Nevertheless, the people involved in this research project felt that the complexities involved in the workplace setting, along with the lack of understanding and awareness of the role, meant that a general resource containing advice and tips would be as useful as a guide, especially for disabled workers, workplace PAs and line managers who have little experience of working with PAs in the workplace.

This resource draws on the accounts of people with relevant experience, and aims to help workplace PAs, disabled workers and their line managers to consider a range of issues that are useful to discuss at the start and as working relationships evolve and develop.

For further information or extra copies of this document, please contact

Dr Katie Graham

Department of Social Policy and Social Work
University of York
katie.graham@york.ac.uk
01904 32 1205

Dr Jenni Brooks

Department of Psychology,
Sociology and Politics
Sheffield Hallam University
j.brooks@shu.ac.uk
0114 225 5991

This leaflet presents independent research funded by the National Institute for Health Research School for Social Care Research. The views expressed are not necessarily those of the NIHR SSCR, NHS, NIHR, or the Department of Health. This leaflet was produced as part of the workplace PAs project. See www.york.ac.uk/spru/projects/workplace-pa

This pocket contains tips for you to give to your workplace PAs and your line manager.

UNIVERSITY
of York

The University
Of Sheffield.

For further information or extra copies of this document, please contact

Dr Katie Graham

Department of Social Policy and Social Work
University of York

katie.graham@york.ac.uk

01904 32 1205

Dr Jenni Brooks

Department of Psychology,
Sociology and Politics
Sheffield Hallam University

j.brooks@shu.ac.uk

0114 225 5991

www.workplacepersonalassistant.org